Message by Mr Koïchiro Matsuura, Director-General of UNESCO, on the occasion of International Mother Language Day

21 February 2007

The mother language is dear to each one of us. It is in the mother tongue that we utter our first words and express individual thoughts best. It is the foundation upon which all human beings develop their personality from the moment they draw their first breath, and which supports them throughout their lives. It is the school for respect for oneself, one's history and one's culture but, above all, for others and their differences.

UNESCO thus endeavours to promote multilingualism, in particular in the education system, by encouraging the recognition and acquisition of at least three levels of language proficiency for all: a mother tongue or first language, a national language and a language of instruction. The promotion of linguistic and cultural diversity is supported by commitment to dialogue among peoples, cultures and civilizations. Diversity and dialogue, identity and alterity are indeed the primary elements of functional complementarity that should be ensured, through multilingualism, in its entirety. This requires harmonious use of the various languages that exist at the national and regional levels and strategies and plans that can promote languages in all situations of life.

Admittedly, despite examples of good practices in various parts of the world, multilingualism seems today to be more an ideal than an actual reality. More than 50% of the 6,000 languages spoken in the world, vehicles of collective memory and intangible heritage, are likely to die out and 96% of these languages are spoken by only 4% of the world's population. Less than a quarter of all languages in the world are used in education and in cyberspace and most of them are used only occasionally. Only a few hundred languages have genuinely been given pride of place in the education system and in the public domain and less than a hundred are used in the digital world.

Take for example the African continent, the cradle of Humanity, where one-third of the world's languages is spoken! Although they are perfectly mastered by the population groups who use them as daily means of expression, most of these languages are hardly used in education, the administration, justice or the public press. Accordingly, the African Union, which considers languages to be one of the pillars of African integration, is endeavouring to implement a regional language management plan designed to harmonize the local and global in the interest of all.

It is such an open integrated approach, far removed from any purely identity-based conception of languages, which should be retained and, with the cooperation of all of UNESCO's friends and partners, be supported generously in furtherance of a multilingual future of diversity and mutual respect.

Thus, to mark this year's International Mother Language Day, I am launching an appeal for national and regional language strategies to be promoted in such a way as to build a harmonious environment for all the languages of the world.
